Thailand detects first official case of African swine fever

Some residents suspect a cover-up; supply disruption set to keep pork price elevated

BANGKOK -- Thailand said Tuesday it detected the country's first ever official case of African swine fever, threatening a prolonged supply shortage and price increases in pork and related products.

Thailand supplied 18 million pigs to the domestic market, and exported one million to neighboring countries such as Cambodia, Vietnam, Laos, and Myanmar. This year, the supply is expected to drop sharply to 13 million.

Thailand detects African swine fever in sample at slaughterhouse

The confirmation came after Thai authorities had for years denied a local outbreak of the fatal disease that has swept through Europe and Asia in recent years and killed hundreds of millions of pigs.

Nearly 5,000 farmers are yet to be compensated for the more than 159,000 pigs culled between March and October last year, a government spokesman said.
